We all carry an understanding of the importance of commons, whether through the collaborative economy, supporting open culture, technology and knowledge sharing, protecting biodiversity and our natural resources, maintaining the infrastructures that benefit the public as a whole, or as an engaged citizen.

Being a “commoner” is using our capacity to engage with others in actions whose impact, perennity and sustainability surpass what we can accomplish on our own.

For whom?

Everyone and anyone

(professionals, educators, citizens, entrepreneurs, students) curious about the commons and eager to practice the art of commoning – no matter your level of experience, or areas of interest and activity.

You are also invited to practice commoning by contributing to the comfort, success, and documentation of the event.

These three days are an opportunity to anchor and deepen our practice and our work and contribute to a global movement of the commons.

This is an experiment in commoning and in holding an event as a commons in an of itself.
